NWU Centre for Digital Humanities presents:

From Digital Consumers to Digital Creators: Embedding Digital Humanities in Communication Education

Koos de Villiers is a lecturer in the School of Communication at the North-West University's Vanderbijlpark Campus. He is currently developing an Honours degree in Digital Communication for the Vanderbijlpark Campus and serves as a Digital Humanities Champion. Koos is passionate about communication, digital media, and technology enhanced teaching and learning, with a particular interest in how emerging technologies can be meaningfully integrated into communication education. His teaching focuses on creating authentic, practice-based learning experiences that connect communication theory with the rapidly changing digital environment. He has a particular interest in social media, multimedia, artificial intelligence, digital content creation, and using technology to encourage students to become critical, creative, and responsible digital communicators. Through his teaching and curriculum development, Koos explores how digital tools can move beyond simply supporting learning to become part of how students research, create, collaborate, and solve real-world communication challenges.
